
Fifa 22 Mem Patch

FIFA games have traditionally featured a range of motion capture training modes, such as the Pro Player Training Centre. EA SPORTS FIFA is bringing “Real Player Motion” technology to the franchise to allow even more dynamic, realistic gameplay. The 12-year partnership between EA SPORTS and FOX Sports creates a TV show, called “Real Player Motion,” to showcase the series. Below, EA SPORTS Global Brand Director Fatih Oztekin and Real Player Motion Technical Lead Victor Kijanka talk about the new technology and what fans can expect with FIFA 22. FS: Why are you excited about Real Player Motion technology? Victor Kijanka: With Real Player Motion, the position of the player will be perfectly tracked in a football match. Players can even overlap onto the ball like they are in real life! One of the other things that caught my attention is how organic the ball looks. There’s a new weight of the ball and colour variations, as well as new material options. VF: How much data does FIFA 2.0 collect about each player and what’s the accuracy of that data? Victor Kijanka: We collect accelerometer and gyroscope data, but there’s a lot of data we can collect as well. We have a large team that tracks player positions, gathers visual information (such as skin temperature) and interprets player gestures. We can even look at the overall shape of the player, as well as the position of each specific part of their body. FIFA 2.0 allows us to offer a dynamic view of individual players, so we can see exactly what the player is doing and why they are doing it. Overall, we have about an 18-20 GB log of data each player generates. There are a lot of references with FIFA, which is the basis of the data. FIFA 2.0 also collects global data. We have a lot of data that we collect from around the world, including FIFA Pro Clubs and World Tours. For example, if a player is playing in France, we collect data from this player and compare the data with data from a similar player in Germany. This will help to provide a better analysis of each player. This type of data will be very helpful for content creators. VF: What players are expected to take advantage of Real Player Motion technology in FIFA 22? Victor Kijanka: When we look
